In this notebook we use Naive Bayes to explore and classify political data. See the `README.md` for full details.

Part 1: Exploratory Naive Bayes

We'll first build a NB model on the convention data itself, as a way to understand what words distinguish between the two parties. This is analogous to what we did in the "Comparing Groups" class work. First, pull in the text for each party and prepare it for use in Naive Bayes.

If that looks good, we now need to make our function to turn these into features. In my solution, I wanted to keep the number of features reasonable, so I only used words that occur at least `word_cutoff` times. Here's the code to test that if you want it.

In [227... word_cutoff = 5

tokens = [w for t, p in convention_data for w in t.split()]

word_dist = nltk.FreqDist(tokens)

feature_words = set()

for word, count in word_dist.items() :
    if count > word_cutoff :
        feature_words.add(word)

print(f"With a word cutoff of {word_cutoff}, we have {len(feature_words)} as features in

With a word cutoff of 5, we have 2396 as features in the model.

In [226... prepare(feature_words, my_pipeline)

        feature words.

    Args:
        * text: a piece of text in a continuous string. Assumes text has been cleaned and case folded.
        * fw: the feature words that we're considering. A word in `text` must be in fw in order to be returned. This prevents us from considering very rarely occurring words.

    Returns:
        A dictionary with the words in `text` that appear in `fw`.
        Words are only counted once.
        If `text` were "quick quick brown fox" and `fw` = {'quick','fox','jumps'},

Write a little prose here about what you see in the classifier. Anything odd or interesting?

My Observations

The classifier yielded an accuracy of .546. This means that our model can predict the party of a candidate based on the feature words extracted from their speech 55% of the time.

Part 2: Classifying Congressional Tweets

In this part we apply the classifier we just built to a set of tweets by people running for congress in 2018. These tweets are stored in the database `congressional_data.db`. That DB is funky, so I'll give you the query I used to pull out the tweets. Note that this DB has some big tables and is unindexed, so the query takes a minute or two to run on my machine.

In [245...  cong_db = sqlite3.connect("congressional_data.db")
            cong_cur = cong_db.cursor()

In [246...  results = cong_cur.execute(
            '''
                SELECT DISTINCT
                    cd.candidate,
                    cd.party,
                    tw.tweet_text
                FROM candidate_data cd
                INNER JOIN tweets tw ON cd.twitter_handle = tw.handle
                AND cd.candidate == tw.candidate
                AND cd.district == tw.district
                WHERE cd.party in ('Republican','Democratic')
                AND tw.tweet_text NOT LIKE '%RT%'

            results = list(results) # Just to store it, since the query is time consuming

In [254...  my_pipeline = [str.lower, remove_punctuation, tokenize, remove_stop]
            tweet_data = []

            # Now fill up tweet_data with sublists like we did on the convention speeches.
            # Note that this may take a bit of time, since we have a lot of tweets.
            for row in results:
                party = row[1]
                tweet = str(prepare(row[2], my_pipeline))
                tweet_data.append([tweet, party])

There are a lot of tweets here. Let's take a random sample and see how our classifier does. I'm guessing it won't be too great given the performance on the convention speeches...

Now that we've looked at it some, let's score a bunch and see how we're doing.

random.shuffle(tweet_data)

for idx, tp in enumerate(tweet_data) :
    tweet, party = tp
    # Now do the same thing as above, but we store the results rather
    # than printing them.

    # get the estimated party
    estimated_party = "Democratic"

    results[party][estimated_party] += 1

    if idx > num_to_score :
        break

Reflections

I could not get this to work. I tried for hours but to no avail.
